Mar 4, 2012 Poorly Correlated Properties: A General Theoretical Framework for Target Discovery and Hit Binder Selection. Our current understanding of receptor-ligand binding is mainly based on static pictures, whose theoretical justification has remained ambiguous. We have recently shown that coupling the receptor-ligand binding energy to the free energy change of protein conformational fluctuations can account for binding affinities and corresponding receptor-ligand complexes in many cases and has been quantitatively validated. Here we show that the fluctuation-based binding energy can be further applied to correlate the binding affinities of biomacromolecules (ligands and receptors) with the corresponding properties (e.g., solubility, pK a s, drug and protein binding affinities, lipophilicity, etc.), which are poorly correlated in the traditional ligand-target profile-based virtual screening. In addition, we propose a general framework to maximize the chance of finding highly relevant compounds with a low number of molecular targets. The concept was successfully validated through comparisons between traditional targeted-by-nature and proposed-by-nature virtual screens. The study highlights the value of exploring protein fluctuations for understanding biomacromolecular f678ea9f9e
